It is well understood that the Latin language like other languages that are rich in inflections, permits great freedom in the arrangement of words. This arrangement is not fastened down by absolute and inflexible rules, but can adapt itself to the range and sphere of idea. What is called the grammatical or logical order, yielding to the demands of emphasis or rhythm, may give place to the rhetorical or inverted order. The order of words is often order of the conception and meaning. In nothing perhaps is this freedom of position better illustrated than in the position of the adjective with respect to the substantive. This gives us the explanation of [illegible] appears to be the shifting position of the adjective. If then the position of the adjective though varying is not arbitrary but directed by meaning and purpose, the inquiry may well be made to ascertain what is the meaning or purpose in connection with a particular position; and still more it becomes interesting to know what is the normal position for adjectives in general when they are used in a particular function. Having given the functions of the adjective, its position in a particular function is of course a matter of observation; and this observation sufficiently extended might discover for us the usage of the language. In this paper the writer proposes to set out the results of an examination in this respect which he has made of the writings of Horace, together with some comparison of these results with the results of studies that [illegible] made in Livence, Caesar and Cicero, but before doing this it may not be out of place to recapitulate briefly some of the views which have been held by different grammarians on the general question of the position of the adjective with respect to the substantive.

Beier, note to Cic. de Off. 1.7.20 (Leipzig 1820), speaking of the conjoined phrase viri boni, has this remark — that for words which have coalesced 'in unum notionem' the customary order is for the substantive to precede, the adjective to follow, unless perchance the substantive is joined with another adjective, or is used in a certain sense of opposition or emphasis.

Reisig, Lateinische Grammatik s 460 (Leipzig 1839), remarks in speaking of the logical arrangement of words in simple sentences and apart from the context, that here one must adopt that arrangement which grounds itself upon the order of logical conception of thought. This demands first the object, then the predicate, and places the two in connection by the logical copula. Therefore in the connection of substantive and adjective, such an order must be adopted as will place the word designating class or genus before that designating species. And in § 461, in speaking of the phrases extraordinaria cognitio, virilis portio, calatis comitiis, Italicum solum, Theodosianus codex, famosus liber, regius curator, inofficiosum testamentum, militare testamentum, which phrases and others having similar position occurred frequently in law writings, remarked that this position of words, which he calls peculiar in that the predicate idea stands before that of the object, came into vogue in order to supply the lack of compound substantives; in order to attain the sense of a compound of an adjective and substantive which they could not form.

Kühnast, Die Hauptpunkte der Livianischen Syntax, page 306 et seq. (Berlin 1872), points out what he terms the attributive position of the adjective, and its appositional position. When the adjective determines the substantive, when it indicates a mark of differentiation for the substantive, it takes the attributive position and comes after. This, he says, is the ordinary attributive position. When greater stress than this is laid upon the adjective, when it forms a closer and more intimate union with the substantive, then it takes the appositional position and comes before. This position is very much used by Livy to indicate the absolute or relative prominence of idea contained in the adjective, analogously to the position at the beginning of the sentence. Often, too, he says, Livy uses this position as a short expression in place of an additional and incidental proposition, e.g. in a bonum Tarquinium I. 56. 3. In consequence of Livy's predilection for a rich and rhetorical coloring of language, the adjective comes before the substantive with him with far greater frequency, relatively, than in the older historians. Kühnast tells us that he made an examination in this regard of the first seven chapters of the twenty fourth Book of Livy, and found that the adjective was used before and after the substantive in the relative frequency of two to one.

Hübner, Grammatik der Lateinischen Sprache (Hannover 1879) § 246, gives as the usual or grammatical position of the adjective attribute, after the substantive, as rosa pulchra, deus immortalis; while the rhetorical or inverted position is for the adjective to come before the substantive, as insitalae res.

Goswrau, Lateinische Sprachlehre (Tübingen 1880), § 514, remarks that the adjective, like the attribute in general, is usually placed after its substantive. In the case of the adjective, he says, this is demonstrated by the standing formulae, as populus Romanus, res alienum, praetor urbanus, Carthago nova, and the like. He further tells us that that adjective is put after the substantive which brings to the substan-a fresh characteristic, not that which is contained in the very conception of the substantive itself. Hence it is said a limiting characteristic or mark goes before, one differentiating the substantive from others goes after.

This summary, in which no effort has been made always to give the exact language of the authors referred to but only the substance of the views entertained, will be sufficient to indicate the general doctrine now held, apart from peculiar cases, as to the position of the adjective.

Proceeding now to an examination of the usage of Horace in this regard, we may say in advance that this ought to prove a field especially inviting for an investigation of this character. The number and variety of his adjectives, the frequency with which he uses adjective especially in the odes, the different styles of composition are all points of importance. If it is objected that it is poetry and not prose, we may say that this then should perhaps show us wherein the poetical position differs from that in ordinary prose. But we may remember that Horace himself hardly ventured to call the Satires poetry, albeit in metrical form. With the finely wrought diction of the odes, with the prosaic tone and measured tread of the Satires, with the more serious and [illegible] character of the Epistles one might almost say that we have here for our inspection the usage in poetry and prose, in tripping fancy and serious reflection, of the same author, and that too, one of the most elegant of writers.

In examining the position of the adjective in Horace, we have preserved the distinction between the use in ordinary attribution and the use in predicative attribution. In the following table we exhibit the separate results for the odes, the satires and the epistles, and the aggregate result for the epodes, Carmen Saeculare and ars poetica, with a statement also of the total usage in Horace; that is, the number of times the adjective is used before and the number of times after the substantive. For a particular adjective then the table will indicate the number of times it is used before and after the substantive in ordinary and in predicative attribution, in what part of the work the usage occurs, together with the total usage. The table is based upon the accompanying index which I have prepared for the purposes of this investigation, showing the occurrences in Horace of an adjective used in connection with a substantive, the substantive with which it is so used, and a reference to the passage where found.

It may be proper to give a few examples as the briefest and most satisfactory way of explaining what is intended to be signified by the phrases ordinary attribution and predicative attribution.

Odes 1.1.26 Venator tenerae conjugis immemor — Here we consider that tenerae is used in ordinary attribution; immemor in predicative attribution.

Odes 1.16.1 O matre pulchra filia pulchrior. Here pulchra is in ordinary attribution; pulchrior in predicative attribution.

Odes 1. 18. 14. Et tollens vacuum plus nimis gloria verticem, Arcanique fides prodiga, perlucidior vitro.
Here vacuum is in ordinary attribution, prodiga in predicative attribution,
perlucidior in predicative attribution.

On this distinction of use between ordinary and predicative attribution, compare Kühner, Grammatik der lateinischen Sprache, §63, where, to express substantially the same distinction, he adopts the phraseology direct and indirect attribution
— the direct being what is in this paper called ordinary attribution. See also particularly §63. 2. Compare also [illegible] Sprachlehre §367. It showed perhaps be said that in some few instances it is not perfectly certain in which kind of attribution, according to our definition, we should consider the adjective to be used. In very doubtful instances we have not classified the adjective with those in predicative attribution.

From the index of which I have spoken, no effort has been made to collate for the table following all the adjectives used by Horace, but only a large number of them taken indiscriminately. After the table for Horace, will be found a table showing in similar manner the usage of Terence with respect to adjectives. This table for Terence is based upon a study of the position of the adjective with respect to the substantive in that author made by the writer in the Spring of 1884, the results being tabulated afresh in the form here given for this paper in order to compare with Horace. Following these two tables will be found a table giving a view in comparison of the results in Horace and Terence, and also Caesar and the orations of Cicero. The part of the table relating to Caesar and Cicero is reproduced from a dissertation, published at Hamburg in 1884, by D. Rohde. The dissertation bears the title, "De elegantia quo ordine apud Caesarem et in Ciceronis orationibus coniunctum sit cum substantivo". Rohde, himself, made a study of the question as to Caesar. The tables for

Cicero he formulated from the [illegible] of Gorgias. The figures were reproduced here for convenience of comparison. Only those adjectives from Horace are used in this table which occur in the tables of Florence & Lucas.
It was deemed unnecessary to re-formulate the others. It is to be regretted that in the studies made by Rohde he preserved for us no distinction between the use in ordinary attribution and predicative attribution.

An inspection of the tables just given, shows us that as a rule Horace placed the adjective in ordinary attribution before the substantive. The adjective in predicative attribution he used somewhat indifferently as to position, but in a larger number of times, in the aggregate, he placed it after the substantive. We observe that the rule as to the position of the adjective in ordinary attribution obtained with greater rigor in the odes, with less in the satires and epistles. In the odes, the attribution is the front position for the adjective is so strong as to prevail in the most part even in predicative attribution. In the satires and epistles where the rule as to ordinary attribution is observed with less rigor, there we find the predicative adjective inclined to take back to its after position.

We see in Terence the same rules of position to prevail. That is, in ordinary attribution he places the adjective before, in predicative attribution he places the adjective after the substantive. But since this difference, the one as to ordinary attribution is [illegible] than in Horace; for in this we find [illegible] to it — While what in Horace as to predicative attribution was barely a major usage, becomes in Terence an emphatic rule.

While the distinction in use is not made in the tables for Caesar and Livy, still we observe in the aggregate the same striking and decisive predominant fact, that the adjective precedes the substantive.

Now the question arises is this position of the adjective in ordinary attribution before the substantive in Horace the usual and natural position or is it inverted in one; or is it in fine only a poetical position to be distinguished from the natural position in prose.

If it is an inverted position, then it must be true throughout his writings, and in an overwhelming majority of instances, Horace uses the adjective in an inverted and not the natural position; and this, not of any particular verse or portion of a stanza, nor of any particular adjective, but throughout and of adjectives generally. If this were indeed to be considered an inverted or non-natural order, which he has made the norm of his usage, it would certainly be an interesting fact. But we find that Terence does the same. And that it cannot be said now to be simply a poetical order, we find the same order in Caesar and in the orations of Cicero. We cannot entertain the idea that metre is to be the explanation of a predominant usage, such as that with which we are now dealing. We are not to suppose that Horace was an artist of such inferior skill as to be compelled to put his adjectives where he would not otherwise have put them, only to patch up the metre at the expense of elegant and graceful expression. To make such a supposition is to suppose that Horace could not write poetry in the language as found it. Notes may well explain an instance which departs from the rule, but the rule itself one is not called upon to explain. In looking for a rule, we must credit first what we find to be a dominant usage. Finding, then, in Horace, that in the case of ordinary attribution, [illegible] adjectives [illegible] our adjectives almost universally are placed before the substantive in the vast majority of their occurrences, we conclude that such is their normal position in the author in question. While the usage was not so well defined as to adjectives in predicative attribution, yet we observe that the stronger tendency was to give adjectives in such use a position after the substantive. We observe this also, in each direction, to be a dominant usage with Terence; and observing also the prevalent position of the adjective in Caesar, and the oration of Cicero, we consider that this is strong confirmatory evidence, each for the other, that the position in question is not a mere accidental fact, but a fact that indicates a general rule of position.

This usage though well defined in Terence is still more sharply brought out in Horace; and according to some examination made by Kühnast, to which we have already referred (attributing the fact as he did to the high-coloring of Livy's style) we observe that the usage is even more emphatic in Livy than in Caesar. From this we conclude that the principle or the usage involved is most probably one of historical development, and could be clearly traced along that line.

Having now seen what the normal usage appears to be, let us examine some of the instances in which there are departures from it. Deviations, for a variety of reasons, from the normal position we have a right to expect in whatever the language would be stripped of one of its distinguishing characteristics. We should expect also to find this established usage of position to be crossed here and there by other laws and usages as strong if not indeed stronger than itself.

We find, then, for example, that dicam is used not at all before the substantive, and four times after. The after occurrences are as follows:

Odeo 3.29.28 Quid Seres et regnata Cyro / Bactra parent Tanaimque discors /

Sat. 2.3.174 Eximii ne vos agoret insania studiis /

Epis. 1.12.19 Quid velit et possit rerum concordia discors /

A. P. 374 Ut gratas inter mensas symphonia discors / . In none of these places coned the position be exchanged for that of the substantive without violence to the metre; and besides in all the cases, the word ends the line or verse - a position of emphasis.

delirus is used not at all before the substantive and three times after. The after occurrences are as follows:

Sat. 2.3.293 Caesus medicusve levarit / aegrum ex praecipiti : mater delira necabit /

Sat. 2.5:71 Mulier si forte dolosa / libertusve senem delirum impositt heris /

Epis. 2.2.126 Rutulorum scriptor delirus inersque videri / — In the first two lines, the longer word follows. In the third, the substantive having two adjectives precedes both.

acer is used twenty one times before, and eight times after the substantive. The after occurrences are as follows:

Odes 4.14.13 — Here it is used three lines below its substantive — an entirely irregular position.

Epo. 12.6 Namque vagacius unus odor or / × gnaui canis acer, ubi latet sus /

Epo. 16.5 Aemula nec virtus Capuae nec Spartacus acer /

Sat. 1.1.5-8 Cum sipa simul avolsos ferat Aufidus acer /

Sat. 1.4.65 Sulcius acer / ambulat et Caprius

[illegible] ire lavatum / admonuit

Epo. 7.13. Aurorae caecus an vagit vis acrior/
In the first instance, canis acer, the immediate inversion is forbidden by the metre, In the next three, the same metrical considerations are observable, besides the position gives an emphatic tone, being at the end of the line. In the next two, sol acrior and vis acrior, the longer and fuller word follows.

alter is used ten times before and three times after the substantive. The after occurrences are as follows.

Epis. 1.18.18 scilicet ut non / sit mihi prima fides et, vere quod placet, ut non / acriter elatrem, pretium aetas altera sordet. /

Sat. 1.6.102 alyne salutandi plures, ducendus et unus / et comes alter

Odes 3.5.34 Et matre Poenus proteret altero /

In the first case, the metre suggests the position, in the second alter is set off with unus, in the third, not only the metre but the custom of Horace to put the emphatic word at the end of the line might furnish the reasons for the position. aureus occurs eight times before the substantive, and five times after. The after occurrences are as follows:

Epo. 17.41 Perambulabis astra sidus aureum/

Odes 4.3.17 O testudinis aureae/ dulcem quae strepitum, Pieri, temperas/

Epo. 16.64 Ut inquinavit aere tempus aureum/

Odes 1.10.19 Virgaque levem coercet/ aurea turbam

Odes 4.2.23 et vitis animumque moresque/ aureos educit in astra — In the first, third, and fifth it would appear that the convenient metre for ending the line may have affected the position — In the second and fourth instances the adjectives are paired between the substantives, a common usage with Horace.

exilis occurs one line before and twice after the substantive, which latter occurrences are as follows:

Odes 1.4.17 – Iam te premet nox fabulaeque manes/ et domus exilis Plutonia:

Epodes 8.10 Veneregue mollis et femur lumentibus/ exile suris addidum – In the first, the substantive precedes two adjectives; in the second the adjectives are paired between the substantive (treating the participle as an adjective).

foedus is used twice before, and four times after the substantive, as follows:

Sat. 2.3.126 Ungere si caules oleo meliore capatque/ coeperis inpexa foedum porrigine

Epis 2.1.236 fere scriptores carmine foedo/ splendida facta linunt

A.P. 392 Caedibus et victu foedo deterruit Orpheus/

Odes 3.5.15 Mens proiida Reguli/ dissentientis condicionibus / hoc dico et exemplo. In the first and second, the adjectives are paired between the substantives. No apparent reason for the position in the other cases, unless the after position was chosen for emphasis.

honestus occurs four times before, and five times after the substantive as follows:

Sat. 2.3.5-8 Thaler, honesta soror, cum cognatis patter, uxor /

Epis. 1.18.34 Scorto postponet honestum / officium

Odes 2.18.8 Nec Laconicas mihi / trahunt honestae purpuras clientae /

Epis. 2.1.149. in rabiem coepit verti jocus et per honestas / ire domos impune minax.

Epis. 2.2.116 Rem tibi Socraticis sermonibus traducet honesti /

A.P. 278 Post hunc personae pallaeque reperta honestae /

Sat. 1.3.42 Errori nomen virtus posuisset honesto /

Epis. 1.2.36 Inclinet animum studiis et rebus honestis /

Epis. 2.2.32 Clarus ob id factum donis ornatur honestis / It is striking that in all the after-uses the word ends the line. In Terence the word occurs twice before and three times after the substantive; in Caesar four times before and twice after; in Cicero seventy five times before and one hundred times after, showing a concurrent and noticeable after-position. From the instances in Horace, cited above, in so far as there is a difference of meaning, when used before the substantive it would seem to mean honest, virtuous; when used after the substantive, honorable, decent, becoming.

iniquus occurs twice before and eight times after the substantive. The later uses are as follows:-

A.P. 67 Seu cursum mutavit iniquum

[illegible] iniquis /

Sat. 1.3.67 Quam temere in nosmet legem sancimus iniquam /

Odes 2.10.4 Nimium premendo / litus iniquum /

Epis. 2.2.19 Insegneris tamen hunc et lite [illegible] iniqua /

Odes 2.6.9 Unde si Parcae prohibent iniquae /

Odes 2.4.16 Regium certe genus et penatis / maeret iniquos /

Odes 3.1.32 Nunc torrentia agros / sidera, nunc hiemes iniquas /

Sat. 2.7.14 Verumnimis quotquot sunt natus iniquis / — In the first instance the word is used in predicative attribution; in all the remaining instances, it is noticeable that the word ends the line, obviously a convenient metrical position for it.

Vocis occurs nine times between the Sub-stantive and six times after, which latter uses are as follows:

[illegible] /

Odes 3.11.36 Splendide mendax et in omne virgo/
nobilis aevum /

Sat. 2.3.243. Quinti progenies Arri, parue nobile fratrum /

Odes 1.14.12 Quamvis Pontica pinus / silvae filia nobilis /

Odes 3.17.1 Aeli vetusto nobilis ab Lamo /

Odes 4.12.17 Dic geticis, invenum nobilium clades /

In the first three instances, metre and the relative length of the adjective (rhythm) suggest reasons for the position. In the fourth, the substantives are placed between the adjectives: in the fifth the adjectives are placed between the substantives. In the last instance, metre may have afforded the reason for the inversion.

Nudus occurs six times before the substantive and four times after, which latter uses are as follows:

Odes 4.7.6. Gratia ... audet/ ducere nuda choros/
Sat. 1.2.132 [illegible] fugiendum est – et pede nudo/
Epis. 1.19.12 Quid? Siquis vobis barbo
ferus et pede nudo/
Sat. 1.8.24 Canidiam, pedibus nudis passoque capillo/ – The first is separated far from its substantive and is used in pred-icative attribution. In the second and third the close of the line is first the same – et pede nudo – a convenient position for the metre and the word stronger in sound following. In the fourth, we have the adjectives paired between the substantives.

These instances, selected indifferently, will be sufficient to illustrate some of the considerations which bore upon the question of the position of the adjective. We see that while the general the normal usage was well determined, this was by no means impossible, but [illegible] to [illegible] immediate [illegible] — to mark [illegible]

the emphasis, and no doubt to special usages for special uses —

Goessnau, Lateinische Sprachlehre, § 368 (Quedlinburg 1880) states that adjectives of time and place, when used in a partitive sense, precede the substantive. Compare also Kühnast, die Hauptpunkte der Livianischen Syntax, page 307
note 183 (Berlin 1872), and Kühner, Grammatik der Lateinischen Sprache page 1066 —

The validity of this rule, thus laid down by Goessnau, is subjected to critical examination and test by Riemann in the Revue de Philologie (1881) vol. V pa-
103. He declares " cette règle semble être assez nouvelle ; du moins je ne l'ai point vue dans les autres grammaires latines que je connais". (He adds a note referring to Kühnast). Riemann makes an examination of the usage of Caesar in this regard, with the conclusion that in general the rule is confirmed as to Caesar, but adds that the same study would have to be made for other authors; and then proceeds to examine a certain number of passages from Terence, from Sallust, from Cornelius Nepos and from Livy.

We observe from the foregoing that the adjective when used in a partitive sense regularly or usually precedes the substantive. There are, as we

Lee exceptions to the rule, but they are relatively (considering all the examples) very few in number. The statement of Goodwin is therefore substantially confirmed as a whole. The reason of the proposition, however, that these adjectives when not used in a partitive sense as a rule follow the substantive, is by no means true. In fact in Greek at least, as we observe, the predominant usage is for them to precede the substantive when they are used in a sense not partitive.

As Riemann remarks, therefore, the distinction of meaning established by Kühnast between media arbor, the middle of the tree, and arbor media, the tree which is in the middle is far from being rigorous in Roman (ubi supra) page 107 — Compare Kühnast, die Hauptpunkte der Lateinischen Syntax, p. 207 note 183 and Kühner, Grammatik der Lat. Spr., page 1066

It is not easy to see that any general usage existed with Horace as to the position of the adjective, based upon the number of syllables of which it was composed, or its length relatively to that of the substantive. Indeed we do observe that sometimes a very short word, or one of light or feeble sound would have a position apparently with reference to those considerations. But since the subtle laws of rhythm were constantly at work, and the position of the adjective as to its substantive would not only be affected by the significance and character of the substantive-word itself, but by the considerations of euphony arising from the relative positions of the other words in the sentence - Compare Dr. Rohde, Adjectivum quo ordine apud Caesarem et in Ciceronis orationibus coniunctum sit cum substantivo (Hamburg 1876) page 2 paragraph 3. To show the variety of positions given to words of different length, both adjectives and substantives, the following passages are cited:

cupidine falso Sat. 1.1.61

ingens trabs Sat. 2.4.102

It may be remarked that, in general, the tendency of the adjective in Horace is to seek a position near the substantive, whether it precedes or follows. The most frequent usage is for the adjective to be in the same line or verse with the substantive, and to be either in juxtaposition with it, or to be separated from it by not more than one word. In very many instances it is in juxtaposition, but the separation by just one word is equally noticeable. When the separation is by just one word, the separating word is a verb more frequently than any other word. In illustration, the following instances may be cited.

Odes 1.2.7 Omne cum Proteus pecus egit altos / visere montis

Without entering into a minute discussion of the foregoing Schedules of adjectives, we may remark that the general facts presented seem quite noteworthy. It appears from the list just exhibited, and more fully from the index following which includes all the occurrences, that in Horace the proportion of adjectives which occur only before is entirely to those which occur only after is very large; and we see that in Terence one hundred and one occur only before, and seventy only after. The large number of adjectives in Terence which occur only after, we ascribe very much to the influence of the usage as to predicative attribution. We have seen that in Terence it was a well marked rule to place the adjective in predicative attribution after the substantive, and that he has proportionally a large number of adjectives used in that way. This is brought about by the fact also that the rule as to ordinary attribution was less rigorous in Terence. These aggregate exclusive occurrences before and after confirm strongly, we think, the conclusions which we have heretofore drawn as to the usages in both Horace and Terence; and they serve well to emphasize the points of difference in usage between the two authors.

In considering the position of the adjective with respect to the substantive in Horace, we proceed now to notice the striking features of arrangement, where there are two adjectives with their substantives. The tendency is to unite the adjectives in pairs, and they have a position in the middle between the substantives, or before the substantives, or after Opta, too, the adjective and substantive will enclose the other adjective and substantive, or some phrase.

The following examples may be cited.

With respect to these special usages, where there are more adjectives than one, and where the adjective is separated from its substantive by a phrase, we have made no effort to give a reference to all the occurrences. Yet the passages referred to are numerous enough to show to what large extent these special positions were used. Franz Peters, in an interesting dissertation "Zur Wortstellung in den Oden des Horaz", (Münster 1870) in discussing the various peculiarities of arrangement in the Odes of Horace notices the tendency to unite the adjectives and subsubstantives, with pairs, and the varying position of the verb with respect to them, in page 15. 4 et seq. — The examination which we have made, as set out above, shows that these peculiarities of position were by no means confined to the Odes, but were arrangements of which Horace was very fond in all his writings. They exist abundantly throughout.

Of these special positions, by far the most frequent was for the adjectives to come together before the substantives; and this accords well with what we have already seen as to the general position of the adjective.

In preparing the written index, I have followed the text of Horace as constituted by Keller and Holder. As the investigation relates to the position of the adjective with respect to the substantive, of course no citation is given of the occurrence of an adjective when not used in connection with a substantive.
